Pennsylvania Presidential Election Returns - 1800 Vote of the Pennsylvania Assembly

Jefferson - 60; Adams - 33; Not Voting - 7; Not Sworn In - 2

From the first vote for the presidency in 1789, Pennsylvania Selected the presidential electors by popular vote. The exception to the rule was the election of 1800. The departure of George Washington from the scene after two terms laid the groundwork for a battle between the Federalists, who supported John Adams and the Democratic-Republicans who supported Thomas Jefferson. Jefferson carried Pennsylvania in 1796 by a narrow margin, securing 14 of the 15 electors (see notes accompanying the 1796 vote table) and the shift of political power in the state continued to strongly favor the Jefferson supporters.

The Federalists and the Jeffersonians differed strongly on the manner of conducting the 1800 election. The Democratic-Republicans had now gained control of the House of Representatives. The Federalists,h owever, still controlled the Senate and were - in effect - in a position to block any election law which the House Republicans proposed. At the time, there was no general election law and each presidential election required the passage of legislation specifying how the election would be conducted. During the legislative session of 1799-1800, the battle of the election law was joined, with the Republicans fighting for selection of presidential electors on an at large basis, an arrangement whereby the Republicans would sweep the state, and the Federalists who insisted on selection by districts, where they could secure electoral votes in their strongholds which could tip the balance in a close national election. The result was deadlock and no election law was passed during the session. The new legislators were no more successful in reconciling their differences and Governor Thomas McKean intervened on 7 November 1800, proposing that they arrive at an accomodation whereby the two houses would select the electors and the state would avoid the embarrassment of non-participation in the election.

The result was a curious arrangement whereby sixteen electors - eight by each house - were nominated to fill the fifteen available positions. It was agreed that fourteen - seven favoring Adams and seven favoring Jefferson - would be supported by the voting members of both houses. The fifteenth elector was to be chosen between two chosen adversaries - Robert Coleman, an Adams supporter, and Samuel Wetheril, who supported Jefferson. As is recounted in the tables below, Wetheril was selected and the state electoral vote was eight for Jefferson and seven for Adams. It could be argued that the Federalists won the battle. However, Jeffersonian strength was too great in the other states and the Federalists lost the war.
